One-Page A.I. Summary: Impact of the "Can I Kiss You?" Program in the U.S. Military

The "Can I Kiss You?" program, developed and delivered by Mike Domitrz through The Center for Respect, has proven to be a transformative and vital training experience for military personnel. Unlike traditional approaches to training on these topics, this program breaks through desensitization with direct, engaging conversations about consent, bystander intervention, and supporting survivors—topics critical to the culture and cohesion of the Armed Forces.

📊 Combined Behavioral Impact Statistics

- 94% are now more likely to ask for consent before engaging in sexual intimacy.
- 95% are more likely to intervene if someone is using alcohol to enable sexual assault.
- 96% are more likely to tell loved ones they are there for them if they ever experience sexual assault.

🔍 Why This Program Is Critical to Military Readiness

Sexual violence undermines team cohesion, mission readiness, and the mental health of service members. The "Can I Kiss You?" program provides a tangible shift in mindset and behavior—moving beyond awareness to action:

- It encourages direct communication in intimate encounters, reducing misunderstandings and preventing harm.
- It empowers service members to intervene safely and effectively, addressing the bystander effect head-on.
- It reframes the response to survivors from judgment to unconditional support, reducing stigma and fostering trust.

By instilling respect-driven behavior and real-life tools, this program supports the military's mission to build ethical, resilient, and cohesive fighting forces.

Conclusion:
This program is not only powerful—it's essential. Its proven results in shifting culture and behavior make it a cornerstone in the military's strategy to reduce sexual violence, build trust, and enhance combat readiness through respect and responsibility.
